MISS HASWELL'S SUCCESS

Made a Great Hit Here in the "Favor of the Queen."

Miss Percy Haswell has in a prize play found an excellent vehicle in which to display her talents this season, for "The Favor of the Queen," in which she appeared at the Academy yesterday, matines, and evening, is a dramatic composition that deserves more than a mere passing notice. That it should be the product of a young man who has just attained the dispity of his twenty-first year is all the more remarkable. Mr. Roy L. Sensahaugh, who has provided Miss Haswell with the play in which she has just commenced this season's starring tour, may well feel proud of his effort. the Queen."

The play deals with the brightest literary era of the world's history, the Golden Age of English literature, and the two most prominent personages of that period, Queen Elizabeth and Shakespeare, are given life upon the minie stage, and appear as characters in the piece. The introduction of Shakespeare is an innovation, and lends an aditional interest to the play, giving it an atmosphere and a color that appeal strongly to an audience.

color that appear extending to an accerto bring Shakespeare as a character upon the stage to-day is a sort of resurrection that is not without a curious interest, and the spectators awalt the first entrance of the Bard of Avon with very much the feelings of one who approaches the tomb of some mighty genius, whose name will forever live on the pages of history. With two such characters before with the scenes divided between the court of England's gracious Queen and the theatre and lodgings of the immortal bard, it is little wonder that the interest of the audience was not unmixed with curiosity.

the audience was not unmixed with curiosity.

However, all this was merely an attractive background to the principal figure in a highly colored pleture. Miss Percy Haswell had all the honors of the evening. Her portrayal of a young woman who seeks a position in Shakespeare's company, in the guise of a boy, was a most excellent plece of work, and she received numerous curtain calls. Miss Haswell's charming personality and grace of manner were never seen to better advantage here than in her portrayal of "The Eavor of the Queen."

Mr. Edwin Evans, a Richmond boy, to whom the future seems to hold bright prospects in his chosen profession, was cast as the Earl of Essex, and sustained that role in an admirable manner. Mr. Evans became a member of Mr. Fawcett's company last season, and made such a favorable impression that he was engaged in the support of Miss Haswell for her starring tour in the new play, in which he has been given quite a prominent part.

The play was witnessed at both performances by large audiesces, that at the matinee nearly testing the capacity of the house.

Some stocks had been hammered down far below what they were actually worth. They represented railroads and manufacturing companies, which were paying eight and ten per cent. on their capital, and all the market powers and conditions could not keep such stocks down.
